Burst

Harriet's Thursday Burst

By Pimp

A small crowd of runners gathered at the Mount Pleasure site for what was to be a rainy run. At the allotted time about a dozen of us started up the hill towards the temple entrance to begin the muddy climb retracing the steps taken earlier that day by Tiny and Huge. Edna looked around at the start and noticed she was the only female to be braving the conditions that day.

Shit In The Pit and yours truly were first up the hill but as expected I couldn't keep the pace and so let the front-runners pass. It was a slippery one catching many of us out with muddy slides heading back down the hill during an arduous climb.

After a slow succession of runners passed me I managed to cling onto a group consisting of Du La Sing, Silent Man and Mother Hen as we made our way across the streams and rocks. At one point I stopped for a breather and let them continue on without me, Mother Hen made sure I had a torch and later I could hear Du La Sing faithfully calling paper up ahead so I wouldn't get lost.....again.

Ten minutes later while taking a slight detour off the paper trail, I felt a searing pain on my knee and another on the side of my face and realized I had had my first painful introduction to the local bees. Loud cries of f*&$$KK.... reverberated around the jungle as I tried to remember my Bear Grylls bee survival training, doing even more damage to my now animated limbs as I blasted through the jungle aimlessly doing my best impression of the funky chicken. Eventually stopped at a stream figuring I could at least roll around in the muddy water if the two muggers had summoned their mates to rough up the Pimp a bit more. All clear, found paper again and headed up the last hill nursing a fast swelling jaw.

As I was cresting the top I heard the trio of Du La Sing, Silent Man and Mother Hen calling out for me figuring they would pick me up on their way back down after they had lost paper for some time at the top and eventually finding the trail downward. I followed the sound of their voices and joined them a minute or so later. Of course I had to recount my bee story, but as experienced Hashers there was little sympathy. I realized then that this was going to be a regular feature of the run.

Down we went for the final assault and the twisting, turning nature of it combined with wet and muddy paper on the ground (bring more staples next time Huge!), kept us on our toes. I heard loud crashing behind me when suddenly a late starting Ice Man pops out and says hello to everyone and then continues to crash back down the hill like a raging Elephant.

Black skies had the trail go dark early and the last part was particularly difficult as we tried to stay on muddy paper. Later Ice Man would recall he found Good Year. At some point, Good Year, one of the most experienced Hashers could not find the paper and had ended up somewhere on the road for which he was later shamefully placed on the cold stuff by Ice Man himself.

It was an adventurous& twisty run and I later joked with Huge that it was like an Indiana Jones trek and had half expected to be greeted by natives with blow darts at any moment .Back at base at last and those not willing to brave the rain and mud made up the sizable numbers for the dinner club. The night was long and the beers were cold, I told my bee story to anyone who would listen
